The Cyclone Cure

A Case Requiring a Severe Medicine

By CLARISSA MACKIE

"I'll never give in," declared Jere migh Butterfield grimly.

"And I'll never give in," affirmed hi wife Eva just as grimly.

"You are obstinate as a mule," snarled Jeremiah.

"And you are ugly as sin," retorted

"We might as well give up this ca and dog life."

"I for one would be glad to experience a peaceful existence." The result of this mutual disagree ment was that the Butterfields' separated and went to live at opposite ends of Blusterville, in the cyclone belt. Jeremiah took as his share of their mutual possessions all the farm implements and stock and the wornout furniture of the house, while Eva Butterfield was content with the rest of the household furniture and the fat carriage horse and a little phaeton. Jeremiah went to farming, for it was the only thing he knew how to do, and his wife opened a summer boarding house because she could cook better than anybody within ten miles of Lilac Villa, as she called her new home. Because Jeremiah stuck to his farming he marketed his crops promptly and placed money in the bank every month. He soon became prosperous, but he was not happy. Every time he walked over his broad acres and saw the tilled land and the green growing crops and the comfortable green painted farmhouse, with the red painted barns and outbuildings, he tried to feel proud and satisfied, but he only succeeded in suppressing a pang of sorrow at the thought that he had parted from Eva, whom he really loved after all.

As for Eva, her house was filled each summer with city people, who praised her cooking and said that nowhere in the world had they tasted such delicious homemade bread and biscuits. such light cake, such toothsome apple ples and doughnuts. Mrs. Butterfield would nod her brown head in acknowledgment of their compliments, and that was all, for she cared not a whit for the praise of any man or woman save that of her husband, Jeremiah, from whom she had voluntarily parted herself forever-so she said.

"For I'll never give in," she said obstinately, though her heart ached every time she made an apple pie, and she vaguely wondered what sort of food the Widow Bentley was serving keeper for the lone farmer. "I'll not give in," was Jeremiah's slogan, and he meant it, although fine wrinkles gathered about his eyes and the hair on his temples became gray. Of course they were foolish, and, as it often happens in cases of this sort fate stepped in and settled their difficulties in the strangest sort of way. "Working up to a storm," wheezed the Widow Bentley one afternoon as she met Jeremiah in the front piazza when he came up from the fields. She was big and ponderous and of a violent temper that brooked no contradiction even in matters of small importance. and Jeremiah Butterfield had learned that the easiest way to get along with his housekeeper was to acquiesce in everything she had to say. "Yes, yes," he said pleasantly, fixing a doubtful eye on the clear pale blue of the sky and the glorious orange and crimson of the sunset.

"I feel it coming in my bones, wheezed Mrs. Bentley once more, sink ing heavily into a rocking chair. "It looks clear enough now; but, mark my words, we'll have trouble before tomorrow night."

"I guess you're right, Mrs. Bentley, agreed Jeremiah pleasantly. might as well get snugged up for storm. I find you're a pretty good weather prophet.

Mrs. Bentley nodded her head sare ly "It's to be the kind that make you glad you've got a good cyclone celhar." she said significantly.

"Cyclone?" repeated Jeremiah incred ulously. "This isn't cyclone weather." The Widow Bentley's brow darkened, and she arose and shook her white apron at an encroaching hen. "I wasn't born and raised in the cyclone belt without knowing some-thing about cyclones," she said, with dignity, and departed for the kitchen, where she could be heard preparing the evening meal to the accompaniment of clattering crockery and rattling pans. "I've gone and put my foot in it now," mused Jeremiah as he fed his horses for the night. "I expect the widow will see to it that I can't eat any supper tonight. I'll bet you everything will be either too salty or too sweet. That's the widow's way, and I wish I'd known it before I engaged her. It's easier hiring a house keeper than it is getting rid of one.

Cyclone weather! Huh!" It had been an oppressive day, and the setting of the sun brought some relief to the overheated earth. Now light, fleecy clouds showed high in the heavens, and over in the northwest a low rim of black clouds bordered the horizon. "I don't know but what the widow was right after all," admitted Jerewith Butterfield as he went in to supand he told Mrs. Bentley this, but it was too late, for, although the housekeeper smiled triumphantly, the husband's gray hairs.

supper was eloquent of her displease ure. The baked beans were too saity, and the biscuits had received an overdose of saleratus and were consequently bitter. The apple sauce was sickishly sweet and flavored with cinnamen when Jeremiah preferred nut meg. But he ate what he could of the meal and said nothing, then went out to the porch to smoke his pipe, and so he fell to thinking about Eva, his wife, and to wonder if she missed him as he missed her and to think of the happy days before they had dis-

It was a sultry night, and the morning was thunderous and threatening. The cattle hung about the gate to the pasture and refused to eat. Even the chickens seemed to feel some impending calamity in the air, for they huddled in corners, and some of them went to roost as the day grew darker.

Jeremiah went in and out of the house several times, and each time he passed through the hall he noticed that Mrs. Bentley was neglecting the housework to attend to the safety of her own effects. Once when she was struggling down the stairs with a huge feather bed in her arms he came to her assistance and carried the burden down to the cellar and from there to that deep subcellar which had been prepared for cases of emergency. The cyclone cellar was a small apartment, cemented all over, and now it was crowded with the possessions of Jeremiah Butterfield's housekeeper. Her feather bed was the crowning eminence of a small mountain of chairs piled with clothing and boxes. A birdcage with its little occupant hopping cheerily within stood on a chair, together with a young rubber plant which Mrs. Bentley was coaxing to maturity. A lantern hung from a hook in one corner.

"You going to come down here before dinner?" asked Jeremiah in a matter of fact way.

"It'll be time enough when the cyclone strikes," said the widow courageously. "I hope you'll have sense enough to let the cattle take care of themselves and come down here, too." "I got to look out for my stock," said

Jeremiah stolidly. Once or twice he looked at the barometer and saw that it was rising rapidly. Then the wind came, light at first and steadily increasing in velocity until it might have registered ten miles an hour. Matters looked serious enough. Mrs. Bentley had retired to the cyclone cellar and pulled the trapdoor down after her.

Jeremiah stood outside watching for the funnel shaped cloud that must come out of the northwest if they were really going to have a cyclone. He had housed all his horses and cattle and hoped that the path of destruction might not be laid in line of his house and barns. His standing crops he expected to lose and was resigned. A clattering whir overhead brought his gaze to the revolving blades of the tall windmill back of his barn. He had meant to lock the blades so that the approaching storm would meet with resistance there. His water tanks were overflowing now and the mill must not be permitted to run any longer. There was only one thing to do. Jeremiah hastened to the room under the tower and moved the lever that locked the blades of the big circular fan. But something was the matter, and he went outside and looked. One of the blades had broken loose and in falling had so jammed the lever bar that there was nothing to control the big fan unless one released the broken blade and so give the lever an opportunity to do its duty.

In a trice Jeremiah was climbing up the narrow iron ladder that led to the platform under the whirring fan. For the moment he had forgotten the coming storm, nor had he seen the funuel shaped cloud whirling down upon him, Just as he reached the platform the wind hurled itself upon the structure, Something snapped in the deafening disturbance that followed. Jeremiah knew that it was part of the windmill and that he was also clinging to it by main strength as they were sucked into the center of the circular windstorm and borne along at a velocity of forty miles an hour. The atmosphere was filled with debris of every sort. Jeremiah was conscious that his house kept pace with him for awhile as he was swept along on the platform, much as was the Arabian prince who in days of old traveled through space on a magic

Something large and dark sent him a stunning blow just as he was sent to musical comedy has been written to the outer edge of the low traveling storm center, and so it happened that he fell to earth on a great mound of soft hay. What became of the platform he never knew. When he recovered consciousness his wife, Eva, was bending over him and crying because she thought he was dead. "Where am I?" demanded Jeremiah, sitting up and looking around at the cloudless sky and then down at the duced during the action of the play. haystack on which he sat. When he saw his wife he really thought he had died and gone to heaven. Then Eva told to his incredulous ears how the cyclone had brushed the edge of her property and that the house was anroofed and the hay he was sitting on and which had undoubtedly saved his life had come from her own vanished barn. The fat carriage horse was dead and her chickens had disappeared from Lilac Villa. "We will have to begin all over again, Eva," said Jeremiah firmly. "We can sell the two places and buy one in California. I'm sure the Widow Bentley would like to buy Lilac Villa, and maybe if she stays in the cyclone belt long enough she'll get caught in one and lose her bad temper." "The cyclone cured us, didn't it, Jerry?" whispered Eva as she kissed her

NEWARK THEATRES

NEWARK THEATRE.

Cohan and Harris will present Raymond Hitchcock and the original New York company in the new musical play, The Red Widow", at the Newark Theatre next week starting Monday night.

This new musical work has been righly spoken of by all who saw i during its successful engagement at the Astor Theatre, New York. described as a new departure in the realm of musical comedy, as it has a real story, and a plot with Russian scenes and characters. The play is handsomely mounted, the setting for each act being equally effective. The first act shows the fover of the Alacazar Music Hall, London; the second act takes place in the leading hotel in St. Petersburg, and the third act veers to the gardens of the Czar's winter palace, where are displayed gorgeous military and court costumes. Among those who will be seen in the most important parts are Flora Zabelle, Ann Pennington, Jean Newcombe, Theodore Martin, George E. Mack, Harry Clark, James Donnelly and Lincoln Plummer. There are also a large chorus and an augmented orchestra.

PROCTOR'S THEATRE.

William Rock and Maud Fulton will appear the coming week at Proctor's Park Place Theatre as headliners on another one of those all-star programs, scintillating with names calculated to excite the anticipations of variety devotees. The scene, which is a truthful picture of the "cabaret" which is at present the rage in Paris and New York, quite goes beyond anything in

In addition to Rock and Fulton, the bill will be embellished by a brilliant number of attractions, conspicuous among whom is Mrs. Gene Hughes, the well-known actress and comedienne, who will be seen in one of the cleverest sketches in showdom, entitled "Youth." Swor and Mack, with their realistic imressions of Southern darkies; an act that is quite different from the usual run of rathskeller acts is the Windsor trio: the Amoros Sisters, better known as "Those French Girls"; Delmore and Oneida, a couple who are at home in mid-air: Mott and Maxfield in an original skit called "The Manicure and the Salesman"; Kluting's animals, which will present a miniature circus, and the photo plays complete another one of those "Proctor bills."

MINER'S THEATRE.

With everything new, except the ragrance of springtime, which seems to cling to its name, "The Cherry Blossoms," so suggestive of flowers and sunshine, will bring its annual bouquet of charming beauties to Miner's (Newark) Theatre next week. Two new musical comedies are introduced. The first of these comedies is entitled 'What Happened to McGuirk" and the second, "Widow McCarthy's Boarders". Prominent among the array of artists are Miss Ethel Hall, pretty and vivacious soubrette; Lore and Payne, sensational comedy acrobats; Miss Lilie Berry, a graceful and charmng comedienne; Charles Crolius, eccentric comedian; Clifford and Rose, in their singing, dancing and musical specialties; Frank Dobson, in original parodies and stories, and Miss Catherine Linyard, high soprano. A special feature with this company will be a series of spectacular living pictures, posed by beautiful models direct from Paris. Many of the best works of the old masters will be produced, all are alive, palpitating with young, red blood and full of gorgeous color. These pictures have created a great sensation in the leading theatres in London and Paris. Rose Pitonof, world's champion long distance swimmer, is the special feature, and will appear in a novel diving act.

GAYETY THEATRE.

Gordon and North's "The Passing Parade" company will begin a week's engagement at the Gayety Theatre commencing with the usual Monday matinee. The show comes here this season with the stamp of approval of all the cities in which it has played thus far.

Heading the cast is James Rowland, the famous Irish comedian: others in the cast are Charles Aveling, Al. Canfield, Lee Rose, George Mayo, Helen Ely, Libby Blondell, Anna Belle, Carrie Behr and many others. A brand new display the funny antics of the
